

Wine List

Wine is so inextricably linked with nature, with one unable to exist without the other. Vineyards don't exist in an isolated world, they are one with their surroundings, becoming part of the landscape.

The importance of encouraging flora and fauna to maintain biodiversity in their vineyards, remains a key theme amongst the producers listed.

Taking inspiration from the main biomes of nature:

Forest, Alpine & Hillside Shrub and Mediterranean Scrubland, we will discover the pioneers behind regenerative farming and how these winemakers are taking advantage of the unique assemblage of terroirs on offer.

Most of Europe south of the Baltic Sea, including all the British Isles, lies in the deciduous forest belt. Without human intervention, this whole area would still be clothed in ancient forest rich with plant and animal life. Due to cool winters and warm summers, alongside moderate annual rainfall, the conditions are perfect for the natural array of flora and fauna, as well as agriculture and viticulture.

With the etymology of deciduous, meaning ‘to fall off at maturity,’ one may agree that this area of vegetation is at the core of nature’s life cycle. Deciduous forests harmonise with the seasons, participating in an annual ritual that sees them shed their leaves and make way for renewal and growth, much like the life cycle of the vine.

Altitude plays a huge part in the distribution of plant life, with mountains supporting a vegetation that is totally unique from that of their neighbouring lowlands. Since the plant life changes with both altitude and temperature, the unique microclimates of the mountains mean one can find everything from Mediterranean flora to deciduous forests until you go above the treeline and reach the ground-hugging alpine plants.

The mountain soil, often thin, rocky and nutrient poor, challenges the vines and plants that take root. The result is often spectacular. These vines tell a story of survival and adaptation, producing wines that are as wonderfully complex and beautiful as the landscape around them.

Covering the hottest parts of Europe, scrubland growth takes place throughout the mild winter, when most of the rain falls. Much like in the deciduous forests, human intervention has destroyed original vegetation in the Mediterranean belt, resulting in many barren hillsides and dense scrubby areas, covered largely with maquis and garrigue, as well as other low-growing scrubs.

This fascinating climate has forced plant life to adapt. Drought and natural fires, result in a plant biome that can retain moisture and prevent nutrient loss. The enchanting beauty of the Mediterranean scrubland lies in its incredible diversity, with many areas considered conservational by ecologists. Winemakers make the most of this rugged landscape by cultivating indigenous grape varietals that thrive in these conditions.
